Rating:If China can be the next world leader, what about India? Is it ready? What should Indians do? The China-US trade war is not the only reason for India’s silence on Tibet. There are many more, including the extra-territorial reach of China’s policies, human rights violations, the need for political correctness and geopolitical interests, to name a few. The issue of Tibet has been debated for many years, both internally and externally, but the restrictions of journalism and trade unions in India have kept the debate limited to a handful of elite circles. Amidst the intense drumbeat of nationalism around the world, India has been quiet. The Obama doctrine of “Asia-Pacific” is dead. Beijing is the new “big kid on the block”. But does India want to be a “transparent neighbour” or a “neighbour”? This is the first of a four-part series on what India needs to do. Will Tibet become a Chinese province? Or, will India stand up to Beijing’s bullying? Recently, there was an urgent appeal from India to Tibetans to self-immolate (as a way of protest). My son shared a video clip on Twitter where Tibetan woman self-immolated in Dharamsala. Tibetans are free-wheeling online. They have formed groups for Tibet issues and have found their voice on Twitter. We must be thankful to them for resisting the Chinese style of controlling any information flow in Tibet. However, the appeal from India was ill-timed. The Chinese are not happy with India. India not only raised the issue of Tibet, but also its bilateral trade with China. India has publicly dismissed the ongoing Sino-US trade war, while simultaneously keeping its hands off the sensitive issue of Tibet. In the eyes of the Chinese, this is not a friend, it’s someone to be slapped. Another aspect is that Tibet is China’s
