the mid-1960s, when New York Times reporter Ben Bagdikian was finishing his magnum opus, The Profiles in Courage, one of the inspirations for that book was a visit to the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., to interview Reagan's longtime friend and adviser, Bill Jones, on May 3, 1963. Reagan and Jones had met in Washington in 1950. They had been friends ever since. During their interview, Reagan mentioned that during the 1950s, when he was traveling around the country delivering speeches on behalf of various Republican candidates, he often crossed paths with Gerald R. Ford, who would become a rival for the 1964 presidential nomination. Ford was Reagan's opponent in the 1950 Senate election in California. They had both been elected to the House of Representatives that same year, and they had both served in the Senate prior to that. In February 1961, Ford won the Republican nomination for the vice presidency, and Reagan became his running mate. In the fall, the Republicans won the White House. "It was at that point when I decided to jump into politics," Reagan would later write, "but I did not do it at Gerald Ford's behest." In one of the best scenes of Bagdikian's book, the two friends sit together in a room at the Reagan Library in Sim
