Shared decision making about the management of locally advanced cervical cancer. The standard of care for patients with locally advanced cervical cancer (LACC) is concomitant chemoradiotherapy. In Canada, the Canadian Partnership Against Cancer (CPAC) Choosing Wisely Campaign has developed an evidence-informed list of 12 questions to ask health care professionals (HCPs) and patients during the informed decision-making process about LACC treatment. We conducted a pre-post study using a convenience sample of patients at one institution in Canada with histologically confirmed LACC. Patients were consented to participate between August and December 2016. After baseline data collection, CPAC-informed decision-making tools were added to the patients' clinical records and HCPs were instructed on how to use them. Patients completed the questionnaires again 2 weeks later. Of the 50 patients approached, 34 were eligible, 19 consented to participate, and 21 completed both baseline and follow-up questionnaires. The median number of LACC treatment-related consultations before decision making was 4. The most common decisions were: to complete a diagnostic biopsy (57.1%), to complete a pathologic report (47.6%), to discuss concomitant chemoradiotherapy (38.1%) and to discuss concurrent chemotherapy (36.8%). Of the 16 HCPs approached, 9 (56%) responded to the survey. The majority of HCPs were not practicing the CPAC recommendations. More than half of patients had not received the full CPAC package and a quarter did not know how to address all of the questions. At the conclusion of the study, 61% of patients were ready to make their decision about LACC treatment. The results of this study suggest that more work
