I am trying to run a binary of an executable which is not an.exe using different ways and one of them says that I can run a binary of an executable which is not an.exe in Linux. I cannot figure out the process of doing this. A: This looks like a case of a zipfile executable. I cannot find anything at this time that explicitly says that this is possible in Linux, but this is explicitly possible in Windows (and a lot of other operating systems). The Wikipedia article on zip files says that this is a standard feature of Windows. A: Yes you can run.bin files in Linux, some special kernel modules are compiled in.bin and are loaded when they're needed. (Google for chkconfig and /sbin/init, this is what they are for). For executing binary files (not executables), use the strace command. It will trace what your program is doing in realtime. Q:
