Hypertension is a major driver of cardiovascular diseases (CVDs). Endothelial dysfunction, inflammation, oxidative stress, and fibrosis are key pathways involved in the development of hypertension. Among them, fibrosis plays an important role in the pathogenesis of arterial stiffening and heart failure (HF). Herein, the underlying mechanisms of fibrosis in hypertension and the pathogenic role of progressive fibrosis in arterial stiffening and HF are discussed. This review provides an overview of the molecular mechanisms of fibrosis with special focus on its role in hypertension and the consequences of progressive fibrosis on the development of HF. The idea that all humans will die is untrue. In fact, the probability of a human dying tomorrow is pretty much zero. The less dramatic, but equally inexorable fact is that all individuals who ever lived, and will ever live, will die. This is kind of an astonishing fact, but it's true. If we all lived to be 110, the oldest person living today would only be 2.5 percent of the entire human population that has ever lived. Even 100 years ago, that would still mean that only 2 percent of all people alive at the time would be living in the year 2000. All these statements can be taken in different ways. We can be fatalistic about the fact that we will all die. We can be fatalistic about the fact that all humans will die. Or, we can be fatalistic about the fact that the probability of anyone of us dying is so small that we can ignore it. It's a rare person who is able to make all these statements in a single sentence, and I'm not one of them. What I will do is express each one of them as a probability: First, the probability of all humans dying tomorrow is zero: Second, the probability of all humans having lived is 100 percent: Third, the probability of all humans living for some
