This time the 49ers. However, before the season, I took the moral high ground and dismissed the hype. "This is not a must-see game." They're rarely a "must-see" game. It's just that the 49ers get far more coverage than other games. That changed in 2012, and 2013. The 49ers are now more than a "must-see" game. I'm not alone in this. During the last two years, only three 49ers games didn't rank among the top four most-watched games in the NFL. The team is drawing almost 30 percent more viewers than the league average. And, in 2014, that average dipped to 27 percent. A 30 percent increase in viewership? That means an average of 1.3 million people are watching the 49ers on Sundays. And that's a problem. First, it's based on eyeballs. But how many of those eyeballs are truly engaged, paying attention to the game? We know the 49ers have problems getting that many eyeballs. So, what's the solution? TV advertising, of course. This season, San Francisco 49ers fans are being offered a chance to support their team at the exact moment it's most important. The campaign to promote the team's Super Bowl appearance is being broadcast during this season's NFL programming. The 49ers are hoping you'll tune in and stay, giving more people the chance to see their team. They're trying to create more of a groundswell of support that's created before a Super Bowl. This is a perfect time to take advantage of the NFL's partnership with NBC. NBC's prime time lineup is 2d92ce491b
