Shanghai and Hong Kong Shanghai and Hong Kong, two large cities, symbolize different sides of the very different cultures of the British Empire and China. Both countries had their own health systems long before the founding of the NHS, but from the early 1900s, the English system was established and the rest of the world joined them, so it is difficult to compare the two health systems. They also both attracted a different demographic, and political philosophies played a part in their growth. Yet, despite the great differences between the two, they have a lot in common: Shanghai and Hong Kong had both very different political climates from the start, both heavily influenced by the party system of the last century (1919) Both were separated by a foreign territory, so they had to make friends and get along with the people who owned the territory - China and Japan. In practice, this was to last for more than 70 years. They were both very corrupt when they were first established. Corruption was not only accepted, but actually promoted by both of these countries! The colonial rulers of both were from very different backgrounds. The British were in charge for many years, but the people who came to run Hong Kong were mainly from the Chinese mainland. This is especially clear in the first 30 years of the territory - the colonial rulers and the colony itself were dominated by people with a strong mainland background. Hong Kong During the last 100 years, Hong Kong was governed by a succession of British, then Canadian, then Chinese presidents, all of them being civil servants. There has been very little change in Hong Kong's politics. The territory still has the same colonial system that was built in the past century, including mostly Chinese people being in charge, the same kind of judicial system, and the same taxation system, which looks very like the tax regime of the UK. An obvious similarity is the practice of renting apartments by the month, the longest rental term in the world! Hong Kong still has a very different identity from the rest of the UK, since it was leased for 99 years to the UK in 1898. This is why, today, children still call it the "British territory." And in Hong Kong, one of the main characteristics of the life of the middle classes was their apartment. We do not know exactly the average monthly rent back then, but from the 1930s until today, it never went lower than 2,000 yuan ($205
