A prospective cohort study investigating the association between parental cognitive ability and children's motor performance. Motor skills are a child's most important achievement in later life and, as with other abilities, a lot of variation is observed between children. Because cognitive skills are believed to be important determinants of motor skill development, we investigated associations between children's observed motor performance and their parental cognitive ability. The aims of this study were to determine whether maternal, paternal or combined cognitive ability predicted children's future motor performance and also, because of the possibility of sex differences, to examine whether associations between parental cognitive ability and child motor performance differed depending on the child's sex. At 3 years of age, mothers, fathers and the children of 1357 mothers and their partners completed the WISC-III. At the age of five, the children were assessed for their motor performance using the Movement Assessment Battery for Children. Mixed linear models were fitted to examine the association between parental cognitive ability and children's motor performance, both overall and by sex. Across all children and mothers, increased maternal but not paternal cognitive ability was associated with better motor performance at 5 years of age. Associations of maternal and paternal cognitive ability with the children's motor performance were weaker than was the association with maternal cognitive ability alone. Sex had a differential effect on these associations: only maternal cognitive ability was associated with children's motor performance, and this association differed depending on the child's sex. In conclusion, increased maternal cognitive ability is associated with better motor performance in children, and the pattern of associations of paternal cognitive ability with children's motor performance was weaker and showed no significant sex differences.1. The Inspector General estimates that just 9% of complaints are followed up in any meaningful way. Over the past year, many politicians and transit advocates have complained about the sluggish reporting and handling of complaints, including those of a $100 million project dubbed the Central Plaza, which closed in the spring of this year. Responding to concerns about a confidential 900 page report released by the Inspector General, the MTA sent a letter to the Inspector General urging the report to be released publicly. In the months that followed the Inspector General's report was released, the MTA looked into its own complaints system but only after they were made public. After much hand wringing, they adopted a new 12-point procedure for handling complaints. The new system is not good, and the Inspector General said that he would be filing a report on the improved procedures at a later date. The Inspector General's recommended the MTA break down its complaint process into three broad "Components": 1) complaints about employee conduct (i.e. "How can I file a complaint about my spouse."); 2) complaints about contractor conduct (i.e. "Someone has taken money from my account."); and 3) complaints about MTA procedures and policies. But the Inspector General found that in reality, the MTA complains process was not just inefficient, but that MTA managers are almost completely insulated from complaints of conduct and complaints about procedures and policies. The MTA's failure to actually respond to complaints about contractors and violations of procedures and policies is so extensive it could not be quantified in the report. The Inspector General also found that the MTA has had a terrible record of responding to complaints. The report found that the percentage of total complaints responded to by the MTA last year was 2.4%, a full 1.6% below the national average. While the MTA
