Have you ever heard the expression "A picture is worth a thousand words"? Well, in Photoshop, a picture is worth a million words. You can take any picture — a photo of a digital camera, or a scanned piece of paper, or a movie — and Photoshop can turn it into anything you want. In this section, you discover the myriad possibilities of Photoshop's toolkit, showing how you can take any ordinary photo and make it into something spectacular. Getting familiar with Photoshop's layering concept You use the layers feature of Photoshop to make all your image editing changes. Layers are groups of instructions that tell Photoshop exactly what effect to apply to your photo or type of image. You can use layers to blend two images in one (a technique called layer masking), change the lighting of a photo (a technique called spot healing), and so much more. You can even change the color of an image that's already been composed, which is how you can turn a picture of a night scene into a picture of a day scene. See the nearby sidebar "Everything you need to know about layers" to find out more about layers. Here's a closer look at Photoshop's layers feature: Photoshop CS3 does away with the need to constantly create new layers by converting existing layers into smart layers. Creating new layers becomes a one-click option. Because of this feature, the screenshot in Figure 1-1 is almost identical to the figure. That's Offense: Like OSU, Baylor likes to spread the ball out and go no huddle. Foles is a quick back to the passer who can attack the middle of the field. He is not a great scrambler, but can fit the ball into tighter windows or make the quick throws. Defense: His quickness and athleticism make it difficult to cover. OSU will try to take the ball away from him by playing him with four linebackers. Baylor will drop safeties deep and try to take away the intermediate routes. Special Teams: Foles is an excellent return man, averaging over 15.5 yards per punt, and better than 40 yards per kickoff return. In The NFL: I don't see a high probability for him to get drafted, but he could be a late round steal. I think he has at least one year of starting and watching him lead OSU should give NFL teams some reason to pick him up. What's New In Adobe Photoshop?

Photo : AP A driver was sentenced to three days in jail yesterday after he violated the terms of his release in October 2017 by vaping inside his car. But this isn't an isolated incident: drivers over the age of 21 have been caught vaping in their cars since 2017. Announced by the Los Angeles City Attorney's office in February 2017, the ban is meant to prevent people from vaping in their car and consequently driving, a concern that has been raised by two bills—HR 5084 and SB 975—to the Capitol this year. In October 2017, however, the ban didn't go into effect. The policy only goes into effect when it is approved and implemented by the governor. In October, one day before the ban was supposed to start, the governor vetoed the bill that would have allowed Los Angeles to begin enforcing the ban. Now, almost a year later, drivers have broken the new rule and it doesn't look like it's going to be repealed any time soon. Los Angeles is home to more than 3.5 million people, so it's somewhat understandable that the city could technically put a cap on the number of people who vape, given that vaping isn't necessarily a consistent use, so the city could prevent it from becoming a widespread activity. But the ban's inaction now is not just a driver ban (like the one put into place by California in 2006, which was followed by Washington, Oregon, and Colorado in 2010). The city has also banned people from vaping while driving even though smoking cigarettes is legal. In fact, two drivers in L.A. have already been sentenced to jail for vaping in their car because of this law. One was given three days and the other was given 15 days. A third man was charged with an "infraction" in May 2018, but no punishment was offered. All three cases were reported on the C.A.D.L.A.'s new anti-smoking website. "Our hope is that our actions will send the message that the operators of motor vehicles are not free to use their vehicle to indulge in an activity that could impact others," said City Attorney Mike Feuer in a statement. In the meantime, the L.A. City Council approved a symbolic measure this year that would ban smoking and vaping in all motor vehicles..W
