Utilization of rice straw hemicelluloses as a starting material for 2-hydroxyalkanoic acids production in Pseudomonas putida KT2440. Hemicelluloses are highly biorenewable, and 2-hydroxyalkanoic acids (HAAs) have many applications in the food, cosmetic, and chemical industries. In this study, rice straw hemicelluloses were enzymatically depolymerized to prepare the substrates for HAAs production. β -1,4-Xylanases (HfxylA-I, -II and -III), α -glucuronidases, and acetylxytan esterases were chosen to degrade rice straw hemicelluloses, and the effect of enzyme combinations on the production of HAAs was studied. The results showed that the highest acetoin production (1242mg/l) was obtained by the enzyme combination of HfxylIII/HfxylA-I. Furthermore, pure 2-hydroxybutanoic acid was produced by enzymatic hydrolysis of rice straw hemicelluloses, and the optimal conditions were obtained by the use of Ca(2+)/EDTA as the buffer and 0.12mol/l acetoin as the inducer. The final titer of 2-hydroxybutanoic acid reached 54.4g/l, corresponding to a yield of 1.56g/l. This is the first report on the production of 2-hydroxyalkanoic acids from rice straw hemicelluloses, which provides a great potential for 2-hydroxyalkanoic acids production in industrial fermentation processes. A comparison of the effects of four intravenous sedative/tranquilizing agents on sleep-wakefulness behavior in rats. The behavioral effects of 4 intravenous sedative/tranquilizing agents were examined: 2 drugs of the opiate type (ethylketazocine and hydromorphone), 1 drug of the nonopiate type (propofol), and the barbiturate pentobarbital. Young adult male Sprague-Dawley rats were treated with these agents during the light (lights-off) period under conditions of a 12-hr light:12-hr dark cycle
