Information systems and network technology and the underlying architectures and services (e.g. the nature of the computing, storage, and networking) are changing the way information is processed and managed. As information systems evolve, information from many varied sources (e.g., disparate business systems, databases, raw data streams, etc.) are aggregated and stored in "data lakes," for further processing. Various parts of the processing of the information involve aggregation and analysis to improve insight into overall behavior of the underlying data. The analytics often include such activities as data exploration, information visualization and data analysis. The information within the data lake may or may not be in a structured format. Furthermore, it may or may not be in a format that can be processed efficiently by traditional computing or business applications. Traditional systems for processing data in data lakes are typically designed for and applied to structured data, such as relational database schemas, where each column of a table reflects a measure of a particular property of the entity being described. The data may be pre-aggregated based on some application view, such as a request by a user to a search engine. However, it is not uncommon to see trends, events, data anomalies, and other data elements in unstructured formats. For example, social media data may be available in unstructured format
